Many parents in these days work in other countries, taking their families with them. Do you think advantages of the development outweigh its disadvantages?

It seems to be an increasingly widespread phenomenon that working couples who are deployed to positions abroad choose to take their children overseas. My view is that this is a positive development although it has drawbacks.

Firstly, it is obviously that children who growing up in a foreign country will have a better career advancement as living overseas can broaden their horizons. This is because they attend school in a different education system and expose to different lifestyles and values of local communities. Therefore, they are more likely to take senior positions of multinational companies in the future as they are culturally competent and able to take a broad perspective.

Moreover, family life can bring enjoyment and help expatriates overcome the sense of homesickness or other negative emotions and maintain workplace performance. For example, they can experience a sense of happiness when eating a family meal, playing games together and celebrating important family events. In addition, communicating with family members on a daily basis can combat the sense of loneliness which they can otherwise feel in a foreign country.

It is true that living in a foreign country may not be a wise decision for some children. This is due to the fact that some of them may not adapt to the foreign environment easily and feel upset and lonely. However, I think this is less likely because with parents' help, children can integrate into the local community successfully.

In conclusion, I would argue that taking children to another country can be a sensible decision, although they may have to overcome language barriers and not familiar with the social norms of foreign countries.

Some people think that universities should provide graduates with the knowledge and skills needed in the workplace. Others think that the true function of a university should be to give access to knowledge for its own sake, regardless of whether the course is useful to an employer. What, in your opinion, should be the main function of a university?

Nowadays, whether universities should mainly provide job-related skills or pure knowledge to graduates has caused heated debates. My view is that practical skills should be the main focus of universities.

Firstly, it is obvious that for most students, the purpose of receiving university education is to obtain specific knowledge and skills, which will enable them to become qualified employees in the future job market. This is because most of them, after graduation, will enter workplace, earn their living, and raise their own families. Therefore, universities, as service providers, have to give top priority to these customers' real needs.

Moreover, focusing on the job-related skills can benefit the university itself. For example, the science fiction blockbuster "Avatar" has marked a milestone in the filmmaking industry and sparked massive interest in 3D technology. If a university could quickly respond, and consolidate teaching resources to offer courses regarding 3D, not only would its graduates be more competitive in the near future, but the university itself would keep pace with the development of modern technology and move forward.

It is true that universities should also pay attention to pure scientific research. This is due to the fact that students interested in theoretical knowledge such as math and philosophy, and they will later become scientists and scholars who will make greater contributions to our society. But unfortunately, these people are few.

In conclusion, the major function of universities should be providing students job-related skills, which will guarantee a high rate of employment, thereby making the society function well, although we should also not ignore the other important roles universities are undertaking.

Some people think that children should obey rules and do what their parents and teachers want them to do. Other people think that children controlled too much cannot deal with problems themselves in adulthood. Discuss both views and state your own opinion.

Nowadays, whether children should obey different rules either at home or at school has caused heated debates. My view is that strict discipline is sometimes important, but it would have an adverse impact or children's problem-solving abilities.

Firstly, some people hold the view that that the main function of rules is to hold children accountable for their behaviour and to help them develop good behaviour patterns from a young age. This is because rules dictate how they behave in different contexts and what they should do in handle demands of the real world. Some school rules forbid inappropriate behaviours, such as using profanities and interrupting teachers during a lesson. Therefore, children will understand how to communicate with others in a friendly manner when they grow up.

Opponents, however, argue that rules may present a challenge to the development of problem-solving skills. Children tend to adhere to all rules without considering whether these rules are applicable in all situations and whether some better alternatives are available. For example, they are taught to listen to parents or teachers at all times, but in the future, there are situations in which the decisions or judgement of those in authority, such as supervisors, are incorrect. So, if they abide by rules again, problems may remain unsolved.

In my opinion, young children need rules to establish some good habits, so they are able to tackle problems in an orderly fashion. For instance, schools require them to read books, attend lessons, do homework and listen to instructions of teachers so as to learn about a subject in depth. This is virtually a problem-solving process that they will follow repeatedly whenever they face challenges in the workplace.

In conclusion, I would argue that rules can be imposed when children are young, although these may pose a threat to their problem-solving abilities.

Some people think schools should only teach students academic subjects. Others think schools should also teach students how to discriminate between right and wrong. Discuss both views and give your own opinion.

Nowadays, whether the one primary function of schools is to help young people to acquire knowledge of different subjects or not is a controversial issue. My view is that schools should also teach them the distinction between acceptable and unacceptable behaviour.

Firstly, some people hold the view that that teachers ought to give priority to academic subjects, especially those are vitally important for the job prospects of young people. This is because technology has advanced so rapidly that only students who have an in-depth knowledge of some subjects are capable of handling professional jobs. Therefore, every student should devote most of their valuable study time to academic tasks, rather than courses that teach how to distinguish between right and wrong.

Opponents, however, argue that exceptional performance in academic subjects does not guarantee career achievements in the future if students do not know the boundaries of behaviour. For example, If they are not aware of behavioural norms, such as using polite language in social or formal settings, they cannot get along well with others easily. Without support from others, they are unlikely to perform well in their jobs, primarily because tasks in modern times are increasingly complex and cannot be carried out by anyone alone.

In my opinion, teachers should teach lessons about how to tell right from wrong since students without this ability can make wrong judgment that ruins their careers. For instance, they may make false claims about the products of their companies to strike a deal with clients, and taking ethically wrong options could damage their reputation or even put them in prison. So, ethics and similar courses should be included in school curriculum.

In conclusion, teaching young people to discriminate between right and wrong is part of the responsibility of teachers, although I understand that some people also lay emphasis on academic subjects.

Today, people do not always work for the same job. Why does it happen and how do people prepare for job insecurity?

It seems to be an increasingly widespread phenomenon that people do not expect to have a permanent job in this rapidly changing world. I think turbulent business environment, and unstoppable technological progress are responsible for this.

The reason why people do not stay in the same job for a life time is that employers sometimes have to downsize the workforce since there are so many unpredictable factors in the world of work. For example, in the times of economic recession, companies have to lay off some employees in order to reduce the running cost. In addition to this, as technology has been developing so fast that some of them may lose employment for the simple reason that they failed to upgrade their skills to meet the work requirements and cannot keep pace with the workplace.

Another important factor contributing to this phenomenon is that people are interested in a varied career. This is because they wish to discover their own talents and fulfill their potential by working for different companies. To be specific, some may prefer to work for large companies, where they can improve skills and increase earnings, others, however, may choose to work for start-ups, in which they are trusted with more responsibilities.

In order to solve this problem, working adults have to pay attention to studying and training to prepare for this uncertainty about job prospects. This means that they have to sharpen their skills and receive education to ensure that they can adapt to an ever-changing world. One solution is to attend courses to acquire a second language because many companies operate in a globalised world and this can give them a competitive advantage.

范例二：

It is argued that we are living in a throw-away society: people throw away what they use in daily life, instead of recycling or reusing them. Why has this happened and how to address this issue?

It seems to be an increasingly widespread phenomenon that people are likely to use products only once instead of keeping these items for a long time. To address this problem successfully, it is important to understand why this throw-away culture has developed and take some effective steps to tackle this modern-day problem.

The reason why consumers today do not keep many goods for a long period of time is these products are not as expensive as before. This is because technological innovations and mass production have reduced the cost of production and improved the productivity of the workforce. Therefore, many people would purchase the newest products, instead of fixing broken ones.

Another important factor contributing to this phenomenon is that people lack environmental awareness. They have not yet realised that their ways of life will lead to energy consumption as well as pollution. Some non-biodegradable products such as household appliance can end up in landfill sites and have destructive effect on the environment. If they are aware that recycling can make their lifestyles more sustainable, they will possibly try to reuse products.

In order to solve this problem, it is necessary that educating people to change they ways they use and dispose of different products. This means that environmental groups can disseminate the knowledge of how to recycle disposable goods and household appliances. Governments can also impose tax penalty on the use of some disposable products, including plastic bags, thereby encouraging people to use eco-friendly alternatives.

In conclusion, I would argue that price cuts and people's changing attitude toward consumption are main reasons behind excessive consumption of consumer goods. The top priority is to raise people's awareness of environmental protection and motivate them to change their lifestyles.

Many people are moving from rural areas to big cities. Why has this happened? To what extent do you think it is a good trend?

It seems to be an increasingly widespread phenomenon that many people from rural areas have chosen to migrate to cities, believing that they are more likely to find employment and enjoy a better quality of life in urban areas. My view is that this movement of population can cause many problems.

The reason why these people have made this decision is because cities are more job opportunities available, so they may earn more money. This means that they can improve living standards and afford more consumer goods than ever before. By contrast, employment opportunities are scarce in rural areas, due to the fact that many industries are underdeveloped and many inhabitants' buying power is limited.

I personally believe that the increased number of urban dwellers can put huge pressure on housing and facilities in cities. This is because most cities are unable to accommodate a large population because of the shortage of land. As a consequence, many migrants may end up living in slums and enduring poor living conditions, because they cannot afford home ownership. All city dwellers are also prone to poor health because urban facilities do not have the capacity to manage waste and sewage effectively.

Moreover, another problem associated with this rural-to-urban shift is that rural-urban income disparity will grow. This due to the fact that young people who are ambitious, energetic, hardworking and creative prefer to go to the cities in search of educational and employment opportunities. Therefore, the shortage of labour has thus become a problem in rural communities and it is not easy to revitalise the local economy.

In conclusion, I would argue that poor employment prospects and sluggish local economies have caused the population shift to cities, and this is a worrying trend.

范例二：

The government is spending a lot of money in improving Internet services. Why is this happening? Is it an appropriate way to spend public money?

Nowadays, whether countries should increase the expenditure on the expansion of Internet networks or not is a controversial issue. My view is that no country can maintain competitiveness without upgrading broadband services.

The reason why investing heavily in internet services is because people who have the access to the Internet are normally more knowledgeable. This is because Internet can disseminate knowledge effectively in the form of book digitization or online documents sharing, and people could also find information more easily online by using powerful search engines. Without government investment in Internet networks, people will have difficulty in staying abreast with the rapid growth of today's knowledge-based economy.

Another important factor contributing to this phenomenon is that the government investment in internet services can revitalise the economy. This due to the fact that better internet infrastructure allows more e-commerce firms to flourish and unlocks the potential of digital technology. For example, there have been some technology companies which have evolved into e-commerce giants by providing services such as food-ordering, bike-sharing and taxi-hailing, thanks to the rapid development of Internet networks, and such services have created numerous employment opportunities and stimulated the economic growth.

I personally believe that this strategic move can make life easier by performing everyday tasks online. For instance, both government departments and private companies have websites and apps available to ensure that people can pay bills, purchase products, banking or even business transactions in the comfort of their homes. This means that they have more leisure time and save money on transportation costs.

In conclusion, I would argue that a well-developed Internet network can have a profound impact on a country's economy and can make people's life more convenient.
